

Notes on the Prophecy of Micah (Ironsides Commentary Series Book 19)

MICAH'S prophecy, while simple in structure and clear in the main, yet contains a number of seemingly involved and obscure passages. In taking up its study, one feels more than ever the need of divine illumination to understand aright the dark sayings so frequently occurring. But the theme of the book is plain. It is the wretched estate of all Israel because of their sin, and the wonderful deliverance to be brought in by Him whose goings-forth have been of old, from everlasting, yet who was to come out of Bethlehem-Ephrath to effect salvation for His people. Hence, though this first chapter begins with their solemn arraignment for the transgression of Jacob and for the sins of the house of Israel, the book concludes with the precious assurance that He whom they have offended will cast all their sins into the depth of the sea. In all this we are on familiar ground, often trodden heretofore, and cast up as a highway by Moses and all the prophets. It is only as to details there is difficulty, and then nothing of a fundamental character.
